There was nothing to like people poured out of the houses and filled the streets, while another makes up their minds in the grand piazza. It was a good patch, an excellent place to watch the business of those who lived and worked in the rich houses that lined Thomas's main square.

The Captain noticed one of the biggest - filled with servants and buzzing with preparations for the day ahead. It was an hour till breakfast and while the cooks worked over the fire in the kitchen, producing unwholesome smells of baked bread and frying bacon, the servants were killed time as best they could.

Two of them, Gregory and Sampson - fat, broad and ruddy - stepped out into the body of the piazza and remained about among the bright colors, the animal smells and the din of trades' voices, hoping to find some action. It was a thrill for them because of the Prince's morning, and the way gone was to see how far you could go without attracting his attention. "I can tell you, Gregory," said Sampson, "I'm ready for them. Just watch me. Let a Montague so much as put a foot in the piazza and you'll see how quick I am." "Sure!" Gregory knew that his friend's boasts just added to the hot air around them. He loved watching the fiery Sampson go, to be said, "How quick you are to me among you men." "Not from the Montagues," retorted Sampson. His face was ruddy with anger. "I'll take on any of these men - or women," he said. "I know that's your level," said Gregory, but one pointed up to the women. This is between the men. Anyway, here's your chance to show us.

The young women dressed in the red and silver uniforms of the Montague house were coming round a corner and on to the piazza. With an exaggerated flourish Sampson put his hand on the hilt of his sword. "Fight," he said. "We're on. That's a fight with them. I'll be right behind you.

"That's what I'm afraid of," said Gregory. He went. The Montagues were over about there. "Be careful. We want a few minutes in the evening. Let them be the ones to start." "Fight!" They might as well have a bit of fun. It wouldn't come to anything serious. Just a bit of fun. "I'll prove to you just then. Let's see what they do." "Good thinking," said Sampson. "And I'll hit my thumb at them. If they talk that it will really show them up." It certainly would, because hitting your thumb at someone was the worst insult you could give to another person. The Montague servants came close. With Gregory's dramatic flourish and Sampson's pointed thing of his thumb the pair presented a very strange and obvious spectacle, which the Montague men couldn't ignore. The Montague servants stopped. One of them, a rather nervous young man named Abraham, stared at Sampson as though he were an insect. He turned slowly to his companion with a look on his face as if to say, "Are they really doing it as they do?" His friend, William, shrugged. Abraham turned back to Sampson. "Are you hitting your thumb at us?" he said. "I'm hitting my thumb at you and me," said Sampson. "I can see that. But are you hitting your thumb at us?" Sampson had seen and whispered to his friend. "Is the law on our side if I say 'you'?" Gregory shook his head. "No. Sampson straightened up. "I'm not hitting my thumb at you," Will, said the Montague. "That's alright then." He knew as well as Sampson what the penalty for starting a fight was. There in you then. The Montagues were about to move on but the temptation was too much for Sampson. He couldn't let this chance pass. "I'm definitely hitting my thumb, though," he said. Gregory, forgetting the danger in this moment of excitement, stepped forward then and gave the Montague a hard look. "Do you want to make something of it?" Abraham seemed to consider that for a moment. "There. Make something of it?" he said calmly. He turned his head and asked his friend. "Bellhouse. The one?" Bellhouse pulled a face. Abraham shook his head slowly. "No. We don't want to make anything of it." Sampson, seeing that the Montague men were about to walk on, brought his feet close to Abraham's and put on an even harder look. "Because if you do," he said, speaking slowly, "I'm ready."

He stepped back, laid his elbow on Gregory's shoulder, crossed one leg in front of the other and looked the Montague servants up and down. Abraham smiled, signaled his friend to follow, and turned to go. Sampson didn't like to think that the fun was over. He moved quickly to hit the Montague's arm. "I don't know who you think you are," he told them. "I'll have you know my master's just as good a man as yours is." "That better, though," said Abraham, stepping upon "Will," said Sampson. He knew that if he and his master were better it would be an admirable result: there could be no going back, in this case the big moment.

The four youths were in complete disbelief. They stood staring at each other, all of them looking to hit fly, when a well-dressed young man emerged from one of the streets that led off the piazza.

Coffee is one of the most pervasive drinks in earth, found nearly everywhere from Tucson to Timbuktu, from Beijing to Beirut. There is hardly a culture where it is not intruded, one of the first things billions of hands reach for every morning. Like its main competitor, tea, it is said to have health benefits. Both have an active ingredient, caffeine, which helps to wake us up and keep us going. Coffee drinking, however, is a comparatively recent activity, far younger than tea or alcohol consumption. Coffee comes from a bright berry that appears on the coffee bush or small tree. The coffee bean is actually the seed inside the berry, which looks like a bean - hence the misnomer. This seed contains the caffeine. From the plant's point of view however, the bitter taste of caffeine is intended as a natural defense against animals who otherwise would eat the bright berries! The most common coffee beans come from the Coffea arabica plant. Once the bean has been separated from the berry it needs to be roasted to bring out the right flavors and taste. The coffee arabica name is a clue to the origin and spread of coffee, which was via Arab and Muslim worlds to Europe, Asia and America. The coffee plant itself is thought to be native to the highlands of Ethiopia. Legend (as written in the 17th century) describes the 9th century geographer, Kaldi who noticed that his herd seemed ever more active after eating coffee berries. Local priests were told of his discovery. After trying the berries for themselves, they too were impressed by the energy it gave. Slowly, the coffee bean's reputation spread. This led to the plant being taken to the trading center of Yemen in the Arabian peninsula. Once established in Yemen, coffee's usage spread. The first written evidence of coffee drinking appears in the Arab world in the 14th century, where it is associated with Sufi monasteries in Yemen. In fact, once again etymology is revealing. The primary Yemeni port in the 15th century was Mocha. It is from here that coffee beans were shipped around the world for the next two centuries. Beans from Mocha became known for their chocolate flavor, and from the beginning, coffee was controversial. Sufis drank it to help them stay up all night in trances or meditation, and this effect made it suspicious to conventional authorities. It was called a drug. This was true not only in the Muslim world but in Europe as well. A 17th century Turkish Sultan had to offer a law permitting the consumption of coffee in the Ottoman Empire. A similar problem arose in Italy, which had been introduced to coffee by Ottomans. Pope Clement VIII had to authorize coffee usage, and the first European coffee house is said to have opened in Venice in 1645. As coffee drinking spread, so did the desire for coffee plants. A loosely-guarded Yemeni monopoly of plants was soon broken by various European powers, including the Dutch, who brought the coffee plant to their colonies in India and Indonesia (the source of Java, another still common term for a cup of coffee). The Portuguese brought coffee to their Brazilian colony, and today Brazil is the largest coffee producer in the world. Its neighbor Colombia is the third largest. The second largest is Vietnam, where coffee production was taken on relatively recently because it is such a lucrative product. The fourth and fifth largest producers are, respectively, Indonesia and India, although some gourmet coffee drinkers, Ethiopian varieties are still considered to be the finest. Coffee is grown in some 70 countries around the world, which produce roughly 8 million tons of coffee each year. Almost 2 people make a living growing coffee. Each year 500 billion cups of coffee are consumed around the world. That is about 80 cups a year per human being! Coffee has been transformed from its origins in
